Description of the site and the findings:

The building appears as a quadrangular factory body, with two cylindrical towers, placed on the south-east and north-east corners. The current arrangement is certainly far from that of the castle rebuilt by Landolfo in 1037, of the appearance of which we have no information.

Apart from the latest additions, most of the current complex dates back to the late 15th century. Filippo Vagnone was the author of the first restoration, around 1490. The oldest part is the southern one, facing Testona, with a cylindrical tower from the 11th century, in which, according to Olivero, pieces of brick and whole bricks of Roman origin could be seen. This is still today the strong element of the construction on which the two floors of the palace and a large basement overlooking the south side are embedded. The eastern wing is not formed by the usual succession of rooms, but only by a portico about three meters wide and the gallery above; closed towards the outside but equipped with large windows both towards the courtyard and towards the hill.

The chapel of San Martino, with a single nave and cross vault located in the ancient tower to the south-east, underwent interventions. The transformation of the courtyard into a large porticoed court, formed by pointed arches in brick, supported by slender columns in local stone, is also due to the Piedmontese humanist; also to the intervention of Vagnone are due the cross windows decorated with terracotta frames, the round terracotta frames containing colored ceramics, in the Della Robbia style, and the busts of Roman emperors.

Further changes occurred in the 17th and 18th centuries, when the building was used as a convent.

The western front appears as a large three-story building with a wall strengthened by 5 large spurs, with rows of windows between which there are machicolations; at the top there are some dormers disguised as pseudo-merlons. Also on the west side there is a basement room, with a cross-vaulted ceiling, which looks directly onto the garden. The interior also has rooms with cross-vaulted ceilings. The current entrance is located on the north side, remodeled and actually built almost from scratch between 1900 and 1907 based on a design by engineer Enrico Mottura. The north-east tower in particular was built in imitation of the ancient one only in 1907 to house a chapel.

The castle has lost its fifteenth-century characteristic of a small private museum of the Vagnone family: most of the Roman and early medieval marbles, placed on the ancient entrance door to the east near the ancient tower, as well as the terracottas that decorated the porticoed courtyard and the Roman busts once placed in the garden, have long since been removed and are now preserved in the Museums of Turin.

Castelveccio is currently a condominium, divided into large and luxurious apartments.
